

PLACES TO VISIT

A visitor guide to New Zealand's rich historic buildings and sites in the North Island cared for by the New Zealand Historic Places Trust.

1 Kemp House

Built in 1832 in the shadow of Kororipo Pā, Kemp House is New Zealand's oldest building and first substantial European home. It was witness to dramatic encounters between powerful Māori chiefs and newly-arrived English missionaries. Take a guided tour of the house and garden, and hear the stories brought vividly to life of how trade, religion, politics, literacy and land deals played out against a sweeping background of war, personal ambition and hardship.

2 Kerikeri Stone Store

New Zealand's oldest stone building was completed in 1836, to warehouse mission trade goods. Later purchased by retired missionary James Kemp, it became a kauri gum trading store central to colonial lives. Today, the Stone Store offers a shopping experience like no other, selling authentic trade goods along with fabulous kiwiana-style merchandise. Upstairs, interactive displays recreate a sense of the Mission Station's time and place. Pick up a snack to enjoy in the garden or on the riverbank.

3 Edmonds Ruins

English stonemason John Edmonds arrived in 1834, expecting to build the Stone Store, only to find it was nearly completed by an Australian after a communications glitch. He established a wheat farm and stone house for his family, and made the country's first stone roller. The timber parts of the house were destroyed by fire in the 1880s but house and outbuilding ruins remain as part of a historic reserve.

4 Pompallier

The thickness of rammed local earth walls in this unique building fascinates visitors of all ages. Named for Bishop Pompallier of the French Marist mission, the French Provincial-style building in Russell was built in 1842 as a printery, tannery (for bookbinding) and storehouse. Nearly 40,000 books in Māori were printed here. Interactive printing, tanning and book-binding activities are very popular while a stroll in the colonial garden suits others.

5 Te Waimate Mission

Wander around New Zealand's second oldest surviving building and stroll in the gardens and paddocks that harbour the remains of the earliest farm in New Zealand. Developed by missionaries to bring European-style farming and Christianity to Māori, Te Waimate is one of the most atmospheric places you can visit. The sweeping gardens are ideal for relaxed picnics beneath the trees. The second signing of the Treaty of Waitangi was held here.

6 Clendon House

Nestled beside Hokianga Harbour, Clendon House links many historical strands. Trader and ship-owner James Reddy Clendon was the first US Consul and witnessed the Treaty of Waitangi. The simple lines, verandah and dormer windows reflect typical colonial architecture. His Māori wife, Jane managed family finances for her eight children for nearly 50 years after Captain Clendon died in debt. Many family pieces are presented in the house. Majestic oaks shelter the garden including fruit trees.

7 Mangungu Mission House

The native timber walls of Mangungu Mission House overlooking Hokianga Harbour were backdrop to Governor Hobson and leading Māori chiefs at the largest signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. The kauri timber-framed construction technique was a local first. Built for the Wesleyan (Methodist) Mission in 1838-39, missionary items, portraits and mementoes of local ship-building add to the historical ambience of the house. New Zealand's first honey bees were introduced here - a significant moment for New Zealand farming.

8 Alberton

Imagine the balls, garden parties and elite entertainments this imposing house has witnessed in nearly 150 years. The prominent Kerr-Taylor family introduced verandahs and exotic towers to their original 1863 farmhouse to create their mansion in Mt Albert. Sophie Kerr-Taylor managed the estate for 40 years, and was a strong women's rights advocate. The beautifully-preserved house is rich with family possessions, many original 19th-century wallpapers, and insights into a privileged slice of Auckland life.

9 Ewelme Cottage

This charming house has the rare distinction of being lived in by the same family for a century. Fully furnished with authentic pieces revealing a day in Victorian family life, highlights include fascinating children's games and a major book collection. Built for Reverend Vicesimus and Blanche Lush in 1863-64 as a 'town' house for the then-rural Howick vicar, it is largely unchanged after 1880s extensions. The luxuriant cottage garden complements the house, with a majestic oak planted in 1866.

10 Highwic

One of Auckland's finest historic places, Highwic, its sweeping gardens and its action-packed events programme provide an oasis of history in bustling Newmarket. One of the country's best surviving Carpenter Gothic houses, Highwic was built by Alfred Buckland as a home for his large family (a prodigious 21 children). Open the door to Victorian family life, or take in the garden with its mature trees, sweeping lawns, fernery, formal beds and native plants.

11 Melanesian Mission Dining Hall

The Tudor Revival-style Melanesian Mission Building has a long association with education in the Auckland region. Originally part of St Andrew's College, an Anglican institution for the Christian education of Melanesian boys, it has also been home to naval training, an industrial school teaching work practices to 'neglected and destitute boys', even a flying school. Built from local basalt, and located in a picturesque setting, it is now leased as a restaurant.

12 Thames School of Mines

Thames gold mines produced nearly 70 tons of bullion. From 1885 the Thames School of Mines offered practical training in the science of gold mining, working to promote more efficient gold production. Once New Zealand's largest mining school, it finally closed in 1954. Today, its educational equipment and the buildings are the best preserved in the country. The mineralogical museum includes fossils from New Zealand and overseas, and one of Australasia's best mineral collections with over 3000 specimens.

13 Whangamarino Redoubt

In the heart of the Waikato region during the New Zealand Wars, British soldiers built the Whangamarino Redoubt in 1863 as an advance post in a chain of defensive forts. The outline can be seen in grassland. The earth-built fort was protected by a ditch and bank on two sides, and six metre high timber stockade and trench on two sides. Two 40-pounder guns shelled the Māori position, Te Teo Teo Pā, nearby on the Whangamarino Walkway.

14 Rangiriri Pā

One of the fiercest, most crucial battles of the Waikato campaign of the New Zealand Wars was fought here in November 1863, with heavy losses on both sides. A major defensive position, the pā was exceptionally strongly built and attacking British soldiers had to scale five metre high walls. Māori defenders were badly outnumbered. British soldiers are buried in a nearby cemetery. Part of the redoubt's structure has survived, although the inner wall (scarp) is reduced from the original size. Visit the Battlesite Heritage Centre in the main township.

15 Te Wheoro's Redoubt

During the battle at Rangiriri Pā in November 1863, this site and its Māori fortifications were captured by British soldiers, and an expanded redoubt built for the British garrison. In the more settled late 1860s it became a British military supply base, commanded by and named for the pro-government Māori chief Wiremu Te Wheoro, of the Ngāti Nahoto iwi, to protect the district in case fighting broke out again. The contours are visible in grassland.

16 Alexandra Redoubt

This well-preserved structure clearly shows the effective redoubt construction, with deep trenches and high earthworks. Built in 1869 by the Armed Constabulary when the town was named Alexandra (renamed Pirogiana in 1896), it was part of a chain of regional fortifications. It was rebuilt in 1872 to provide refuge if necessary for settlers concerned about unrest, with the Māori King Tawhiao's settlement only two km away. It was abandoned in 1886.

17 Tapuae Haruru Redoubt

The redoubt's strategic location guarded the Waikato River crossing at Lake Taupo's outflow. Constructed in 1870 by the Armed Constabulary, the perceived threat from war leader Te Kooti came to nothing and in fact the redoubt saw no fighting and was abandoned in 1885. A comprehensive design, it included a telegraph station as well as quarters for officers and men and a reading room. The courthouse also functioned as Constabulary hall. An 1874 pumice-block magazine built to house munitions also survives.

18 Te Pōrere Redoubt

This evocative site saw the last major battle of the New Zealand Wars. In 1869, after being pursued by the Crown across the North Island, Māori leader Te Kooti fortified the redoubt by adapting classic British military techniques to create two levels of earth walls and outer ditch, with corner bastions. Te Kooti escaped capture, but 37 of his supporters were killed and are buried here. Enjoy the short walk through native bush.

19 Opotaka

Situated beside Lake Rotoaira and backed by swamps in a beautiful natural setting, Opotaka is the site of a 19th-century Māori kāinga (village). The remains of houses, kūmara storage pits and ovens are still visible at the site. From here, view Motuopuhi, on the other island in the lake, where the great chief Te Rauparaha wrote the haka that was later made famous by the All Blacks.

20 Springvale Bridge

Spanning the Rangitikei River, 'off the beaten track' on the Gentle Annie Road between Taihape and Napier, this stylishly engineered yet rare suspension bridge was opened in 1925 for farmers to send meat and wool to markets. In 1970 a new bridge superseded Springvale, but local sentiment saved the original. The area is enjoyed by locals and visitors as a picnic spot.

21 Hurworth Cottage

By the 1860s, the settlement of Hurworth near New Plymouth was a thriving self-sufficient community of six houses. During the Taranaki Wars, the families fled and all but this cottage was destroyed. The house was built by Harry Atkinson, who went on to become Premier of New Zealand four times. The simple rectangular cottage with front verandah and attractive garden is idyllic, while the early graffiti drawn on the walls is a reminder of more difficult times.

22 Antrim House

Built for Wellington businessman Robert Hannah, founder of Hannah's Footwear, and his family, Antrim House was both elegant and advanced for 1905. It is a grand house, built in the Italianate style with beautiful stained glass windows, kauri panelling and zinc ceilings but with modern touches like gas, electric lights and indoor bathrooms. There is a stable block and conservatory. Appropriately, it is the headquarters for the New Zealand Historic Places Trust and an oasis amid high-rise buildings.

23 Old St Paul's

Undoubtedly Wellington's most loved church, its first Anglican cathedral is built from local materials in Gothic Revival style, and consecrated in 1866. The interior glows with native timbers, stained glass windows, memorial brasses and colourful flags, including the US Marines. Public protest saved Old St Paul's from demolition after a new cathedral was built in the 1960s. Still consecrated but not a parish church, Old St Paul's is used regularly for many cultural and spiritual events.

24 Pencarrow Lighthouse

On New Year's Day 1859, boatloads of Wellingtonians went to Wellington Harbour's Pencarrow Head to celebrate New Zealand's first permanent lighthouse lit "in all its brilliancy". The lighthouse was made of cast iron in England as a kitset and sent to New Zealand in 480 packages. Mary Jane Bennett, whose husband drowned on the rocks below, became lighthouse keeper, an extraordinary role for a well-brought up Englishwoman. Eventually the lighthouse was replaced with another at sea level for better visibility in fog.
